In selecting it as the foundation of a few remarks to-day I have been actuated by no feeling of unkindness to the North, but by a sincere desire to contribute somewhat to the permanent prosperity of the South. If the cause of education has been nurtured and cherished at the North until its advantages are universally recognized, we surely have no reason to be envious or jealous; but rather, learning wisdom from experience, we should strive with greater zeal to emulate a good example. To educate the common mind is the first duty of us all. It is a duty we owe to ourselves, our children, our country, and our God. To educate the rising generation is a high duty; to educate it correctly is yet a higher duty. Every son and daughter should be schooled for that position which he or she is expected to occupy in future life. If children are dedicated to their country - as all children should be - it is vastly important that their minds be so trained as to make them in all regards the most useful members of society. If they are to live in the South, and follow Southern occupations, it is of the very last importance that they receive Southern educations. I propose to treat the subject under several heads, and very briefly. First, the advantages of education. It sometimes happens that uneducated men or women...
