Excerpt: .building in connection with the state college of agriculture. Zentaro Kawase, professor of forestry at the imperial university of Tokio, Japan, has been nzaking a tour of the national forests of this country to learn the government s methods ofselling timber and of reforestation. HILE many citizens in Minnesota have been wonderW ing whether reforestration was possible in Northern Minnesota, forest experts employed by the state forest service, the forestry school of the university and the government have been busy planting hundreds of thousands of trees. The planting of 160,000 trees, for example has just been completed in Burntside state forest, under the direction of the state forest service. On the north side of Burntside lake and west of Crab lake, on rough, rocky, purely non-agricultural land, these trees have been planted. The tracts for planting had to be carefully selected. In som.e cases, the tree planters had to hunt for places where the small trees could be placed. This is the type of the land that the proposed amendment to the state constitution seeks to have set aside for purely forestry purposes. It is unfit for agriculture or grazing, Use of Spades Impossible. The small trees, averaging six inches in height were planted with the use of a grub hoe or mattock. Two men were employed together. One used the mattock to open the hole. The other one, carrying a pail full of trees, followed him and put in the small tree. It...
