Once when the golden day had dawned and died, Narcissus, lily-cradled by the side Of silver-waved Cephissus, whose soft sheen Day-long divides his meadow-margins green, Was found by woodland nymphs. Him, for the sake Of his famed river-father--wont to slake Their thirst beside his fountains--and his own Exceeding beauty thus ere boyhood shown, Unto their forest haunts they nimbly took, And nurtured in a leaf-entangled nook. And day by day the boy in form and face Grew fairer, by the myriad waving grace Of slender arms encircled--grew to be More comely than the gods did e'er decree To mortal man before. His beauty was The beauty of a tall flower in the grass Where-o'er the golden hours glide one by one, Steeped in sweet slumbers of the golden sun, A dream-fed beauty: in those night-black eyes Lay undiscovered realms of...
